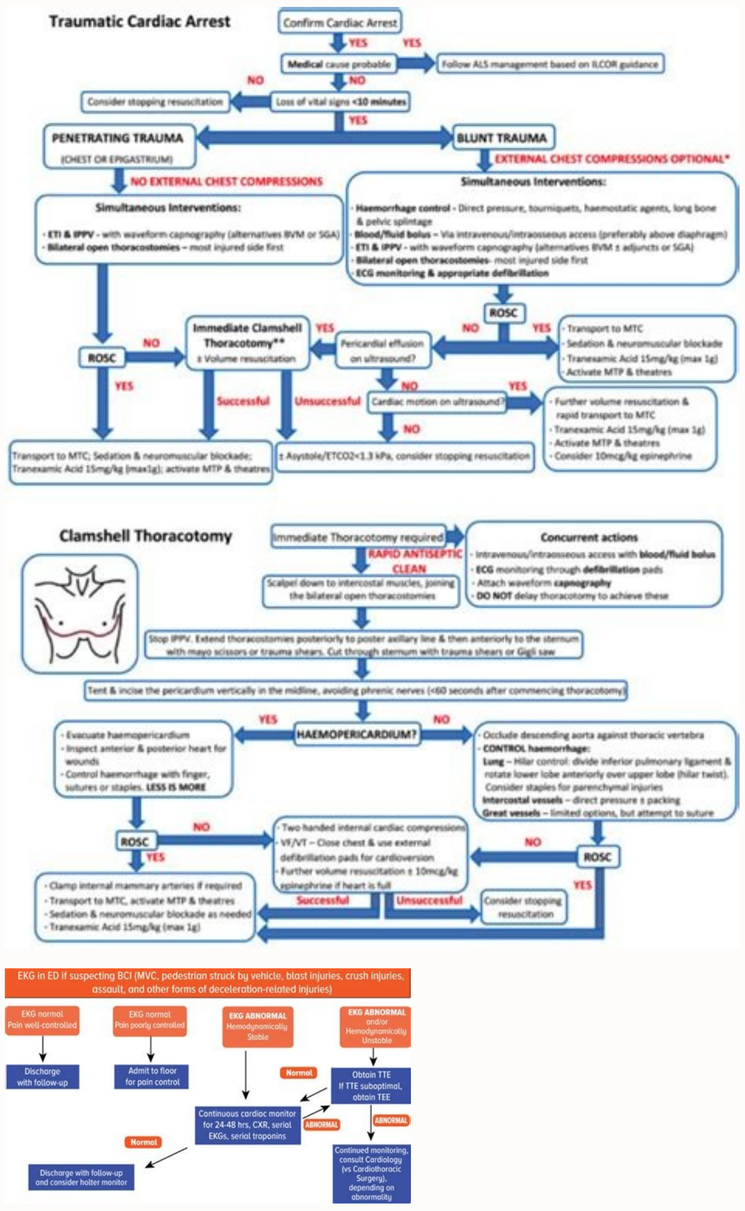
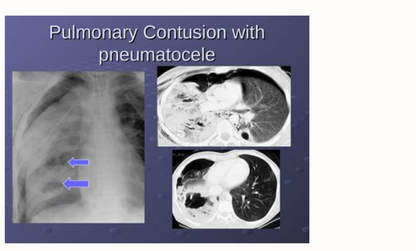
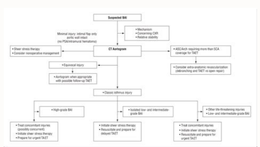
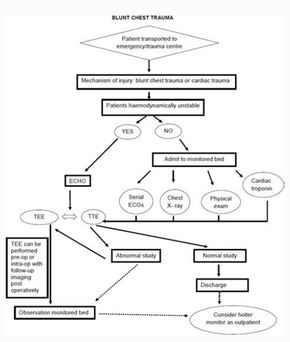
Blunt chest trauma management guidelines









Continue cardiac injuries are diagnosed in less than 20% of patients with slander fractures. Shoulder immobilization is the initial standard treatment. Patients are treated with analgés and are advised to minimize activities that involve the use of pectoral and shoulder-waist. Most injuries can be repaired mainly with a continuous or interrupted braided suture (1-0 or higher). In a patient with multiple injuries, CT is not very precise and magnification resonance (NMR) is not very realistic. Patients present with head and neck cyanosis, subset hemorrhage, periorbital echymosis and head and neck petechia. For most patients, it is oral or parenteral analges. The findings that suggest diaphragmatic disruption in chest x-rays may include abnormal location of the nasogastric probe in the chest, elevation of ipsilateral hemidiaphragm or abdominal visceral hernia at the chest. Occasionally a synthetic mesh made of polypropylene or dacron is needed to repair great defects. Patients generally report inspiratory toxic pain and discomfort over the rib or fractured ribs. Sometimes, the surgical intervention is indicated for the reduction of a severely displaced fracture. This can be achieved by placing the arm in a sling or shoulder arnéns. Neurologic sequelae are usually transitory. Intravenous liquids are administered judiciously; The overload of liquids can precipitate respiratory insufficiency, especially in those with significant pulmonary contusions. Rib fractures 8-12 should pose the suggestion of associated abdominal lesions. The choice of reconstruction depends on the depth of the defect. The injuries located in the center are the fastest of repairing. With the above, the middle end of the collarbone may become more prominent. This injury is best addressed through the chest because the liver obscures the abdominal approach.
